"it appears as if it was the potential of memories... such an irresistible space, where the binary meets, and where pleasures are invented"

Drift Net is an interactive/devised performance exploring the concept of the Internet blogging phenomenon - blogging as a virtual way of living and re-living a moment in time or perhaps even as future memories.

People change identities, play different roles and simulate a virtual life via blogging; shifting our perceptions of self, machine and the world. We own memories and intentions made possible by digital apparatus, enabling us to exercise our fantasies and extend the notion of existing in this make-believe world.

Drift Net taps into a man's journey as he ventures into his second life on the Internet, drifting between desires and dreams.

Start Summary

Drift Net explorations

Using unconventional instruments – LED (Light Emitting Diode) and muscle sensory device – to interact with a performer's body, the movement of the body is translated into quantitative data that manifest via the elements of sound, light and video. The performer's emotional and corporeal responses create the direction, speed, volume and intensity of the technical elements; these technological systems are in turn constructed and controlled by digital media software.
