In She Ain't Heavy, She's Reaching Into Space, Faye and Kai perform discussion and discuss performance using a format they created within the last 6 months. The format requires that they discuss what to perform, perform it, then debrief it after. This brings focus to the integral role of discussion in collaborative performance-making. They debate, agree with, and wait for each other's feelings and thoughts. Are their arguments compositionally interesting enough to be considered a performance in themselves? Is their decision-making process vulnerable or guarded? How real can their discussion be when it is staged?

Come witness Faye and Kai becoming premier self-referential dancer-discussers as they reveal their creative process and blur the line between studio and stage, rehearsal and performance, process and result.

Workshop

Come be part of a session that experiments with various movement patterns. Discover the potential of physical contact as it acts as a communication and miscommunication tool in this workshop. Working in pairs, engage in an inquiry-based learning with mysterious to solve and negotiations to dance through.

No prior dance experience required. Participants are encouraged to sign up in pairs and will stay and work together in their pairs. If you're joining alone, no worries! We will arrange to pair you up with someone!
